What is a thesis?

A thesis is your paper boiled down into one, specific sentence.

It should have 3 (for a five-paragraph paper) points specifically laid out in the order you want to discuss them:

Dogs are great pets because they help owners get exercise and are loyal and friendly.

If using this as a thesis, the paper should follow the format it lays out. The first body paragraph should be about dogs helping owners get exercise, paragraph 2 about dogs being loyal, and paragraph 3 about dogs being friendly.

You should be able to transition smoothly between paragraphs, so order your points in a manner that flows well logically.

Each paragraph should begin with a topic sentence that relates directly back to your thesis.

What is a conclusion like?

A conclusion should do just what it says: conclude. It can get a little tricky, though. You should not introduce new information into your conclusion. If you have not talked about it before your conclusion, then don't use it.

Also, don't copy and paste parts from your paper. Wrap up your ideas, but say them in a new way. Readers don't want to read the same sentences over. They want you to remind them of what you've been saying and what your point is, but in new words. Don't just wrap up with "Dogs make great pets because..." Say something like "People ought to consider getting dogs. Not only are dogs loving, caring, and loyal, but they are good with people and provide a healthy pastime for their owners."

Obviously, this would need to be a little longer to be a good conclusion, but hopefully it will give you the idea of what your conclusion should be like.
